Don't even consider it, Winter.

You're in love with Moon. You've always been in love with Moon.

And he was just thrust into your class and your life. Stop thinking about the late nights you spent confessing and talking and working. Side-by-side, waking up tangled together. Late for school, chasing each other down the streets towards the long days and the longer nights between them.

Think of your family. Think of the children you want one day. Think of how they'd reprimand you. Think of how they'd beat you, beat it out of you. They'd hurt you. They'd hurt him--you wouldn't care, though.

Don't imagine his clothes, baggy jeans and a loose t-shirt. Don't imagine them on your floor. Don't think of his broad shoulders or his lean, strong runner's legs.

Or the way he looks at Moon, those soft dark eyes, the eyes of someone so hopelessly, effortlessly in love.

And the way his hand rests on your thigh when he reads what's on your laptop

And the way his tiny smile grows as she keeps telling her ridiculous party stories.

And the way he grips the couch until his knuckles turn white with every rousing clap of thunder.

And his soft voice that just lulls and croons over his music.

And his eyes, more passionate than hers.

And his blonde hair.

And his smirk.

Try not to fall in love with him, Winter.

Try not to fall for him.

Now try harder.
